PROGETTO

The choreographic project focuses on exploring repetition.

Repetition as a fundamental structure found in music, dance, as well as in nature and in space.

Patterns that repeat, overlap, dissolve, and return are part of everything that surrounds us, and it is precisely from this observation that Loop Box was born. The research began with a musical analysis of hip hop, questioning in particular how this style came into being, a style whose technical and compositional core lies in the “musical loop.”

We can say that hip hop originates from the repetition of the “break,” that is, the reiteration of a musical section within a track.

We asked ourselves: how do we recognize a loop? When does it end? How many repetitions are needed for something to be perceived as a loop?

The loop creates a constant tension toward what is yet to come, while always travelling along the same path, a kind of déjà vu that unexpectedly brings you back to where you’ve already been.

From the very first artistic residencies, we understood how many possibilities and expressive layers the concept of a loop could contain.

We therefore decided to play not only with sound and movement loops, but also with visual loops, layering possibilities and amplifying the scenic result.

We also chose to actively involve the audience, inviting them to participate spontaneously and directly in the creation of the scene during one section of the choreography.

Loop Box is, in essence, a box that with just a few elements is able to generate endless variations without ever truly repeating itself, surprising both the audience and the performers every time.
